

Rob Whittle is currently the Deputy Division Leader of the Feynman Center for Innovation at the Los Alamos National Laboratory. The Feynman Center is an innovation catalyst that moves innovation along the path from scientific creativity to deployment of a solution. Rob has a long history of high technology product management and marketing success. His role at the Feynman Center is to guiding strategic partnerships, promoting collaborations to enhance innovation, and supporting successful intellectual property licensing.

Prior to this role, Rob was a leader in innovation with several industry leading companies including GE, Honeywell and Motorola where he developed and coordinated strategy, capitalized on industry and market trends, created successful partnerships / licensees to bring new products to market. He has been an innovator and entrepreneur in both start-ups and large companies. He holds an Engineering Degree from Brigham Young University.